China's coronavirus

The number of people dead from the new virus outbreak in China has risen to 811, surpassing the number of deaths in the 2002-2003 SARS pandemic. However, the number of new cases reported over the last 24 hours on Sunday fell significantly from the previous period, something experts see as a sign that the spread of the virus may be slowing.

SARS is widely considered to have killed 774 people and sickened 8,098, mainly in mainland China and Hong Kong. The response this time has been much quicker and countries around the world are implementing stricter measures to contain the spread.

China's leaders are trying to ensure food supplies to crowded cities. They are also trying to calm down the population in relation to possible shortages of food and medicine. They want to prevent panic buying, like the one that occurred after most access to Wuhan, the epicenter of the outbreak, was cut off.

However, not everyone agrees that the authorities are acting correctly. People are very angry that the police reprimanded the young doctor who issued a warning about the virus when nobody had yet heard about it. The doctor was a 34-year-old ophthalmologist who died overnight at Wuhan Central Hospital, where he worked and probably contracted the virus while treating patients in the early days of the outbreak. Users of China's Weibo microblogging service have left hundreds of thousands of messages mourning Li's death and criticizing the authorities for the way they treated him and other people who helped alert about the virus.
